

Are there still good reasons not to include listed real estate in your asset allocation?

That's the question that arises, given the brightening top-down and bottom-up outlook for the sector after a five-year period marked by covid, inflation and rising interest rates.

The expectation of a normalization of monetary policy after two years of rising interest rates has lifted the weight of uncertainty weighing on real estate companies, with the immediate effect of loosening financial conditions. After peaking in autumn 2022, the cost of refinancing companies began to fall at the end of 2023, with the prospect of a pivot point, thanks to a combination of lower rates and lower margins:

The latest issues in early September fell below the 4% mark (Unibail Rodamco, 3.68% for 7.5 years)³. While the marginal cost is still higher than the cost of existing debt, the gap should continue to narrow, enabling the sector to sustain its growth. Moreover, disposals are less urgent for the most heavily-indebted companies, thus avoiding potential distressed sales and the associated loss of income. From a “bottom-up” perspective, and more specifically from the real estate markets, the low point in property valuations for the vast majority of asset classes was indeed reached as anticipated in the first half of 2024, with some real estate companies such as Klépierre even benefiting from slight revaluations (+2%)³. This is a strong signal of the attractiveness of the stock market discount to net assets values at the bottom of the cycle. This is still significant (25% for R-co Thematic Real Estate⁴), offering a comfortable entry point.

So, does this leave any good reason not to return to listed real estate companies?

The first reason could be the intensity and expected pace of rate cuts. It's true that the slow decline in inflation has somewhat delayed central bank decisions and caused volatility in the sector. However, the latest economic indicators leave less and less doubt about the global slowdown underway, with the US job market, Eurozone growth and Chinese PMIs all weakening, foreshadowing a rate cut that is likely to be in line with market expectations. However, we can't completely rule out the possibility that this convergence will cause further market volatility as contrasting macroeconomic indicators are released. This risk, for a medium- to long-term investment, seems to us to be contained and may, on the other hand, offer additional entry points.

Could the risk of recession represent a stronger headwind than the tailwind of falling interest rates?

It all depends on the type of real estate market we're addressing. Offices (which account for 15% of the fund⁴) are by definition sensitive to the job market, and therefore to a recession. However, not all properties have the same risk profile, and central areas (around 80% of the fund's office allocation⁴) with low vacancy would be much less affected than areas already abandoned by tenants. This would reinforce the current polarization of the market. Logistics (10% of allocation⁴) could see rental demand continue to slow, but here again long-term trends (reshoring in Europe) should limit the impact depending on the area. Retail (29% of allocation⁴), which depends on consumer spending, could experience a slowdown, but rising real consumer incomes and the diversity of retailers in shopping centers will act as a shock absorber. Following the advent of e-commerce and the covid crisis, shopping centers have also purged a good number of struggling retailers. Housing (30% of the fund⁴), on the other hand, would benefit from a recession. In Germany, this sector, which is defensive by construction, has a substantial growth potential, thanks to the significant gap between current rents and market rents, the convergence of which is hampered by restrictive regulations. Property companies investing in this segment would therefore benefit from continued strong rental growth, in addition to lower interest rates. The sectoral breakdown of the portfolio therefore makes it possible to manage, to a certain extent, the risk of an economic slowdown.

What about regulatory and political risks?

These are certainly the least predictable. The recent example of dissolution in France and the rent freeze in Berlin (2020) are good illustrations. Although housing is probably the most exposed, it benefits from a scarcity of supply (new construction has ground to a halt following the abrupt halt in the development market) and the need for renovation to meet the challenges of the energy transition, which should protect it from overly coercive political measures, as the state cannot do without private capital.

In conclusion, the financial markets seem to have taken the measure of the investment opportunity that the sector currently represents, posting the best performance of the Eurostoxx over 1, 3 and 6 months (as at September 16)³. There is still significant potential for appreciation (25% discount for the R-co Thematic Real Estate⁴ fund), which should attract generalist investors who are still underweight property companies.

SRI Risk: 5/7. The synthetic risk indicator helps to assess the risk level of this product in comparison to others. It indicates the likelihood that this product will incur losses due to market movements or our inability to make payments. We have classified this product in risk category 5 out of 7, which is considered a medium-high risk class and primarily reflects its position in the market for shares of French real estate companies and European real estate investment trusts (REITs). In other words, the potential losses related to the future performance of the product are at a medium to high level, and if the market situation worsens, it is likely that our ability to pay could be affected. The risk indicator assumes that you hold the product for 5 years; otherwise, the actual risk may vary significantly, and you could receive less in return. Other important risk factors not adequately reflected by the indicator include the impact of techniques such as derivatives. As this product does not offer protection against market risks or guarantee of capital, you could lose all or part of your investment. For more information on the risks, please refer to the prospectus of the UCITS. Key risks: capital loss risk, discretionary management risk, market risk, sector risk, risk related to non-financial criteria (ESG), sustainability risk, credit risk, interest rate risk, currency risk, and risk associated with the use of derivative instruments.
